A Sheldon man commenting on the statement of Dr. E. T. Bowers that every drink of whisky a man takes shortens his life eleven hours, and every drink of beer takes twenty-five minutes from his life, is inclined to doubt the truth of Dr. Bowers' observation. "If this were true," he says, "I have in mind one Sheldon man who would have died eighty six years, nine months and fourteen days before he was born."—Sheldon Enterprise.

Here is a splendid paragraph from the Emporia Gazette: In every town it is the men with the town spirit who count. It does a man no particular good to be rich; to be famous or powerful smart. If he has not the town spirit, if he is not willing to grow with his town, he is a poor citizen, and in the end is a failure. Success is largely measured in a man by his community spirit. He may be as poor as Job's turkey, or as rich as the gravy on the same—it makes no difference in his happiness and manfulness, for he can socialize himself and count largely in either event.
